In honor of the 50th anniversary of the civil rights movement, this panel will address the issue of media and race relations. After years of not-so-benign neglect, news directors and editors began to look at the way they covered stories in general in relationship to diversity, and how they covered issues of race in particular. This panel will explore various aspects of that coverage, what has been done, and what still needs to be done. The topics will be: why race still matters, communicating racism, minority use of media, role media played in early civil rights movement, and what are the next steps. The discussion will then be opened up to the participants.
